

The Ten Commandments of Marketing

6TH COMMANDMENT:

Don't Just Think...Feel.

One common failure of marketers everywhere is our tendency to overthink things. We assume our audiences will see and hear our story with the same intellectual rigor we applied to its creation.

Certainly we want to be analytical in our approach and deliberate in our execution but it's important to recognize that our consumers' first reaction is emotional not rational.

Whether it's a highway billboard, a website home page, the cover of a paperback or a homeless person's handwritten sign, the cells in our bodies and brains squirt some kind of hormone or enzyme and we have an experience. Typically subtle but nonetheless impactful.

Our job as marketers and communicators is to control the squirt — to manipulate our target audience into a predictable response: buy, sell, join, click or simply turn a page. And lest you think “manipulate” has too Machiavellian a ring to it, I would gently remind you that it's what we are all paid to do.

If we are to be successful persuaders and influencers, we must learn to empathize with our audiences and tap into their feelings of compassion or self-interest, courage or fear, humility or vanity, generosity or avarice, and altruism or envy.

In order to convince the minds of our consumers, you must first capture their hearts.

HOW TO LIVE BY THE 6TH COMMANDMENT

While we need to connect with our consumers on both a rational and pragmatic level, unless we first make an emotional connection we may never get to deliver the message. An effective marketing message connects with the needs, minds and hearts of the audience.
